Abstract: Different interest subjects in the whole society hope to occupy a more favorable position in the reform. There are many problems and challenges that are difficult to solve at the level of convergence and conflict of interests. The mechanism and system of democratic decision-making and supervision in China are still not sound. Government governance bears an extremely important responsibility in national governance, but there are also some problems that public power cannot be effectively constrained, The degree of social autonomy is still extremely limited. Cooperative governance is a new approach to national governance, and its core lies in the coordination between national governance and social governance, which requires vigorously building a new mechanism for the modernization of national governance that is dynamic, stable and benign.

Keywords: Cooperative Governance; Social Organization; Modernization of National Governance

Introduction

In the process of modernization of national governance, the most perfect and ideal state is to achieve "good governance", so that social governance and government governance can effectively coordinate and interact, and jointly serve the development and construction of the country. In recent years, China has continuously deepened the reform.

1. Basic elements of benign interaction and cooperative governance between society and government

1.1 Common governance is the basic form of modernization of national governance

Cooperative governance is a new model and structure for the improvement of public policy and the operation and management of public power, in which multiple social subjects participate. Cooperative governance between government and society A new innovation and development of deepening reform and improving governance model in China needs to be constantly promoted and developed into the management and construction of various public areas. Joint governance requires the participation of multiple subjects, the coordination and cooperation of our government and society, and the maximum play of its own advantages and role to ensure the smooth and effective operation of the national machinery. In today's era, the quality of our citizens is constantly improving, and we have some good suggestions and opinions on the development and governance of the country. If we can integrate the strength of social citizens, we will certainly be able to promote the development and governance of the country.

1.2 Social organization is an important part of the modernization of national governance

With the continuous development and improvement of national governance, people pay more and more attention to the importance of cooperative governance. Only by cooperating with each other to give play to the enthusiasm of each subject, can the effectiveness and scientific nature of national governance be guaranteed to the greatest extent. With the development of society, more and more complex factors need to be taken into account in national governance. However, the improvement of people's living standards and quality requires more scientific national governance Effective, which puts forward higher requirements and challenges for government governance. Cooperative governance can effectively coordinate the interests and advantages of various subjects, make national governance more scientific and democratic, and also regulate the level and mode of national governance from a social perspective.

1.3 Consultative Democracy is the Inevitable Road to Modernization of National Governance

The political objective of traditional national governance is relatively single, and the formulation and operation of policies rely more on the linear management of the government. Although such a governance model ensures the construction and implementation of some policies to a large extent, it is of great significance to maintain the stability and continuity of policies. However, policies lacking social participation will become impractical in many aspects due to the lack of local style. In the context of the interests of multilateral subjects, the traditional governance model is likely to lose some efficiency and fairness. In the process of national governance with the participation of multiple social entities, the goals and interests of national governance will become more scientific and diversified, and relevant policies can also involve more interests of multiple entities. Especially in some areas with complex interests, the government needs to formulate policies and solve problems through social cooperation governance and joint consultation.

2. Issues needing attention in the cooperative governance between society and government

2.1 Inadequate ability of society and government to cooperate in governance

In the process of government governance, even the new model of cooperative governance inevitably has some problems and limitations. Although cooperative governance can involve the interests and requirements of various subjects, no model can be perfect. In the specific implementation and operation, there will inevitably be some practical problems. Only by constantly improving and developing the governance model, can we constantly adapt to the development and progress of society. Cooperative governance should realize the coordination and cooperation of the interests of various subjects and optimize the governance model. The new model of cooperative governance is quite different from the traditional governance model.

2.2 The cooperative governance between society and government is uncoordinated

Compared with the traditional governance model, cooperative governance puts forward better requirements for society and government, requiring more coordination and rationality of cooperative governance. However, in specific development and actions, it is inevitable that differences and problems will arise due to differences in opinions and interests. There will be more complex environment and many uncertain factors and problems in the future national governance. It is difficult for all subjects to realize the coordination and cooperation of common interest in the joint cooperation of all subjects, which makes it difficult to reach a certain consensus in the final joint action.

2.3 Unclear responsibilities of cooperative governance between society and government

The diversification of governance subjects can coordinate all parties, but in the process of development, it will inevitably lead to the diversification of the final responsibilities. If the responsibilities are not clear in the process of cooperation, or if problems occur, they will shirk their responsibilities from each other, which will eventually lead to the failure to implement the responsibilities and bring many problems to cooperative governance. In order to achieve the final effect of cooperation, it is necessary to clarify the obligations and responsibilities of each subject. The traditional governance model of this team is also a big adjustment. Because it involves the responsibilities of each subject, it is necessary to improve the construction of relevant mechanisms and systems, constrain the behavior of each subject through the power of the system, and finally achieve the optimal governance effect to prevent a series of problems of escaping responsibility and inaction.

3. Ways and Strategies to Improve the Modernization of National Cooperative Governance

3.1 Improve the ability of social and government cooperative governance

In the process of improving national governance, we will inevitably encounter various problems. In a complex governance environment, only by constantly overcoming new difficulties can we constantly optimize the governance model and make it more adaptable to the development and change of reality. Compared with the traditional governance model, cooperative governance has formed a good new model of joint development and coordinated cooperation between society and the government. The traditional governance model relies on the supervision and development of the government itself. In the new model of governance, both the society and the government need to strengthen the development and construction of cooperative governance capacity.

3.2 Clarify the responsibilities of social and government cooperative governance

To avoid possible problems in cooperative governance, we need to divide responsibilities according to their respective roles in the process of coordination and cooperation. Social forces participate in national governance and policy formulation, and they also need to bear certain responsibilities for their own actions. At the same time, in the process of cooperative governance, all parties have the responsibility to supervise and restrict each other. In the process of establishing a coordinated relationship, both parties also need to strengthen the construction of the restriction and normative system, ensure the efficiency of cooperation in foreign policy formulation and problem solving, and also ensure to prevent the abuse of public power.

3.3 Build a dynamic core mechanism of common governance

The new model of cooperative governance will inevitably encounter some obstacles to cooperation and institutional rigidity in the process of its specific operation. It is very important to build a new model of cooperation that is dynamic and efficient. Consultation and cooperation is an important principle of the new model. In the construction and governance of a harmonious society, we should give full play to the initiative of each subject, better coordinate the interests of each subject, and improve the efficiency and effect of governance.

3.4 Promoting the Construction of Spiritual Culture in Cooperative Governance

In cooperative governance, strengthening the construction of a common culture of coordination and cooperation is of great significance for strengthening cooperation and promoting mutual recognition. To strengthen leadership at the level of political values, both sides should establish the concept of cooperation and service. On the one hand, we should strengthen the guidance of scientific theories and improve the ability and quality of the two sides' cooperative governance. On the other hand, we should constantly improve the participation significance of social subjects. In some issues related to our own interests, we should actively express our own views and opinions, and better optimize the relevant management and policy construction.

4. Concluding remarks

China has its own characteristics in the development of regions, populations, ethnic groups and other fields. In the governance of the country, we should also take these characteristics into account and find the best governance model and scheme according to specific differences. In national governance, the diversified interest demands of multiple subjects make the governance in relevant fields more complex. It is inevitable that some mismatched and unreasonable problems will occur if the government is only relied on to supervise and formulate relevant policies. With the development of our society, the people's subjective consciousness is getting higher and higher, they have more understanding and attention to some hot issues and policies, and they also want to get more voice.
